Excerpt: . . . for reading, of course, he must do something, and billiards is a very fascinating amusement, said May apologetically. Still, I am beginning to understand why foreigners think that English people care for nothing but playing games. Perhaps in winter he will have more time for work. Your brother hunts six days a week in winter, which he would tell you was very hard work indeed, said Mr. Gethell, shaking his head. But if he would set aside even a single hour daily in which to occupy himself seriously now, I should be thankful. It would soon become a habit, and extend itself to a longer period. He is so young. I wish, my dear young lady, that you would use your influence. I have known my brother so short a time, and he is older than I am. I dont like to interfere, said May; but her blue eyes were troubled, and she sought counsel from Lady Denys. The old ladys eyes flashed as she listened, and her face lighted up with eagerness. Oh, May! my little May, we are kindred spirits indeed, she cried tremulously. Mr. Gethell is quite right, quite right. You must rouse yourself, my dear, and put aside the thoughts of your sorrow, and use your influence to save your brother. But you and Cousin Anthony, who have known him all his life, must surely have more influence than I! It is never the people we have known all our...
