Edward Stickney Wood, Professor of Chemistry in the Medical School, died on the 11th of July, 1905, in the sixtieth year of his age. Dr. Wood was appointed assistant professor of chemistry in 1871, and at the end of his five-year term as assistant professor he was promoted to be full professor, being at the time thirty years old. He had received a very thorough training in medicine, having cherished a definite purpose to be a physician even before his entrance into Harvard College. When he entered on his duties as assistant professor, the Medical School was supplying instruction in general chemistry, and Professor Wood for years gave much of this elementary instruction; but he gradually developed valuable courses in medical chemistry proper, and...
