Under the wise laws and a liberal government instituted by the founder and Proprietary, whose ideas of religious tolerance were the far-reaching influence to this end, Philadelphia very soon became the most cosmopolitan city in the New World, and equally distinguished for the thrift, progressiveness and intellectuality of her citizens. The light which the pre-Revolutionary newspapers throw upon her history shows that in the last days of the Colonial era, her merchants, factors, traders, shippers and farmers exalted Philadelphia, and she thus became the wealthiest and most conservative of centres, a position unique and preeminent in her relation to the capitals of the neighboring provinces. As we scan the fading pages of our ancient city press we may learn of the genesis of many of the leading families of these later times, whose foundations of wealth were laid in the hive of a relentless industry which characterized the home of their vigorous ancestry. Among those names most frequently mentioned we come across one belonging to an early citizen whose prominence and genius have been little heard of by this generation. Thomas Leiper, for sixty-odd years, was a useful and influential figure in the activities of the last century. He found the opportunity while building up his...
