They sometimes had positive ecological impact, but under the military model, the existence of fire betrayed a moral failure that counteracted one of the Armys greatest 11 strengths, its ability to compel behavior. The tension between the military as enforcers of a national code and residents as representatives of an individualist past increased. Before the military arrived, park superintendents decided that tourists and their campfires were the most frequent sources of man-made fire. Without organized areas for camping and accustomed to spending nights outside wherever they chose, local and regional travelers did not yet regard Yellowstone as sacred space but rather behaved within its boundaries as they did anywhere else. Little in the federal code compelled them to act in any other way, for although Yellowstone had been formally established, no set of administrative regulations to govern it had yet been devised. This difference in perception required intervention from administrators. Once assistant superintendents were...
