They had become sufficiently active so that confinement in a cage was necessary. The body temperature rose and food was consumed with apparent relish. It is also significant that the cats with high transection showed very little recovery in the post-operative period--in fact, several died--and the level of blood pressure in those that lived was low. In every case of unusually low blood pressure before anemia of the brain, there were concomitant manifestations of indisposition. Evidence for central mechanism. The precise extent of recovery is more or less immaterial--even the question as to whether or not any recovery has occurred is, from the point of view of these experiments, of secondary importance. That a certain level of blood pressure is being maintained after transection of the cord and that this pressure is ultimately sufficient for the performance of the usual metabolic processes is indubitable. The matter of prime importance is the central mechanism which is responsible for the maintenance of this pressure, whatever it may be. Does it lie in the medulla oblongata or is it to be found in the cells of origin in the spinal cord? The evidence for the location of the central mechanism in the medulla lies in the results obtained by ligation of the head arteries, by stimulation of certain afferent nerves before and during cerebral anemia, and in the effect of excision of the stellate ganglia or section of the extrinsic cardiac nerves before and after occlusion...
