The work done with the various Harvard photometers is in all cases incomplete and is often affected with unaccountable night errors. The star deserves careful observation by one of the highly accurate modern methods, and the light measures should be undertaken if possible in connection with a spectroscopic study. No doubt there are irregularities in the system, but the evidence favoring all the small, anomalous but permanent oscillations in the light curve that were supposed by Stratonow appears to the writer to be untrustworthy. The Harvard photometric work, though insufficient for an individual solution, suffices to contradict some of the largest secondary variations. Incidentally the Harvard photometric range is practically identical with the adopted visual range. The details of the computations for / 3 Lyra, which were rather extensive and laborious as other curves were reduced and investigated in the hope of...
