Bigaud, the much-admired French painter, was as much esteemed for his ready wit as for his talents as an artist. Though sought after by all as a portrait-painter, he was always unwilling to employ his pencil in the service of the ladies of the court---For, said he, if I paint real likenesses, they are always diasatisiied, and, were I to paint them all handsome, how few of their portraits would bear a reseinblaneel To one lady in particular, who, whilst she sat to him, complained of the glare of his colours, he sarcastically replied-- And yet, madam, tee loth buy at the same shop. New plan, A young nobleman, not remarkable for punctuality in the payment of I. is bills, once called on the Margravine of Anspach in an elegant new phaeton, and at parting begged she would come to the door just to look at it. Tis very pretty, (said he, ) and I have it on anew plan. Before I set my eyes on it, my lord, (said she, ) I am afraid you have it on. the old...
