Excerpt: .avowed their principles, find no other shelter against the $orm impending over their heads, than forsaking their homes atSfa plunging once more their unhappy country into all the horrors of another civil war. La Vendee is as;ain rising from its ashes; or rather those embers which had for feme time lain dormant without ever being entirely extinguished, begin to blaze, though not with all its former violence. Is then this desolated land again to be embrued with, human blood? When will humanity cease to be shocked with a view of those horrors of which Brittany has in particular been the fad theatre! Its once fertile foil now presents nothing to the weary eye but a dreary waste: its castles now lie level with the ground; its villages consumed by the devouring flames; whole forests reduced to ashes for fear they should serve as a retreat to the Vendean, Whilst rts pastures, where the harmless.couh trymen trymen were wont to tend their numerous herds, now barren and desolate, offer nothing but the deadly image of ruin and devastation. On the same spot where the shepherd s pipe used merrily to resound from the neighbouring echoes, are now heard the piercing shrieks of the hapless mother whom the dreadful scourge of war has untimely bereaved of her children. Those unfortunate emigrants who, reposing upon the lenity of the late government, had come home vainly hoping by their presence to get again possession of their property, are...
